This paper explores issues in selecting clients for community-based long-term care (LTC) to help LTC workers make better choices for older people to meet their needs. The need to select older people as well as to provide appropriate care is a well-recognised challenge in the field of LTC. Existing research on this topic is limited and the policy and practice implications of these gaps are unclear. A literature review and a qualitative study were conducted between 1997 and 2001. In the literature review, a detailed search of the MEDLINE database was conducted. In the qualitative study, 30 semi-structured interviews were conducted in community settings with LTC clients, their families and community workers. Data were analysed using an iterative process. Most of the literature and interview participants agreed that client choice is based on the need to meet individualised service needs and the capacity to meet those needs. These factors are not selected on the basis of clinical or social age. Other factors include capacity, priorities, personal circumstances and the personal characteristics of the client and the assessor. Clients with a greater range of needs and those with a greater capacity to meet them may be considered for more intensive services and services costing more. LTC workers may find that selecting clients on the basis of their clinical and social age is the easiest approach. Those who prefer a less clinical approach to selection may find that clients' needs and capacities are not met by these services or may find it difficult to provide services according to needs. The literature review suggests that older people are not selected for LTC based on their social age but they may not be selected for intensive services or services which are more 50b96ab0b6
